DHS AND YOU

The Oregon Department of Human Services touches the life of every resident of Jackson County. From monitoring the purity of water provided through public drinking water systems to certifying food handlers to overseeing hospitals and ambulance services to testing every newborn for a range of metabolic disorders, DHS helps protect the health of everyone in your county.

DHS also provides a range of direct services to many county residents. These include food stamp benefits, child protective services, mental health and addictions treatment, parenting classes, oversight of long-term care and group home facilities, and a range of other assistance designed to help Oregonians remain independent, healthy and safe.

In all, DHS operates more than 300 programs and services either directly or through local partners such as county health departments, tribes, area agencies on aging, group homes and other residential programs, and many other providers and organizations. Approximately 84 percent of DHS's operations budget flows directly to communities to provide the specific range of services needed to meet the unique needs of each community throughout the state.

DHS Partners

Working with communities and partners helps DHS achieve the unique solutions that best meet the needs of each community and its residents. This takes effective partnerships, a willingness to listen, and the flexibility to customize services for each community. The full list of our partners is too long to include here. What follows is a very brief list of the many types of partners with whom we work:

- Health care practitioners
- Mental health and substance abuse counselors
- Hospitals and community health care clinics
- County mental health and public health agencies
- Local and tribal governments
- State and federal agencies
- Adult care facilities
- Foster parents
- Schools
- Area agencies on aging and other senior services providers

DHS can succeed in making a positive difference in the lives of Oregonians only if we build strong relationships with these and the many other partners throughout the state who help deliver the services Oregonians need. We thank all of our partners for the important role they play in making it possible for Oregonians to lead lives that are independent, healthy and safe.
